

Is Christianity a Copycat Religion?

Sean McDowell

As a college freshman, I read an ancient non-biblical story about a crucified god who was born of a virgin, who had 12 disciples, was considered a great teacher, promised his followers immortality, and rose from the dead after three days. The similarities to Christianity seemed too great to be coincidental. To be honest, it unsettled my faith a bit. Did the founders of Christianity copy from an ancient pagan mystery religion?

Recently there has been a barrage of books, movies, and Internet articles making this very claim. According to The Da Vinci Code, “Nothing in Christianity is original.” The biblical story of Jesus is said to be plagiarized from mythological figures such as Mithras, Adonis, Osiris, and Attis. Despite its popularity, this accusation fails for three main reasons.

First, the differences between Christianity and the mystery religions are far more profound than the alleged similarities. For example, it’s claimed that Osiris was a dying and rising god like Jesus. Osiris was murdered by his brother, who cut his body into 14 pieces and scattered them widely. Osiris’s wife allegedly found 13 of the pieces and revived him and made him god of the underworld. This story is utterly different than Jesus’ voluntary death which conquered sin and led to His physical resurrection (1Co 15:3-8). While words such as resurrection and baptism often appear in the pagan religions, the similarities end there.

Second, parallels prove nothing. What if I told you about a British ocean liner that could carry 3,000 passengers, had a top cruising speed of 24 knots, and had an inadequate number of lifeboats? What if I told you that this ocean liner hit an iceberg on its maiden voyage, which tore a hole in the side of the ship causing it to sink along with 2,000 passengers? Most likely you would think this was the Titanic. But you would be mistaken. I am describing the Titan, a fictional ship described in Morgan Robertson’s book, The Wreck of the Titan. It was written 14 years before the sinking of the Titanic. While the similarities between the two accounts are striking, they do nothing to undermine the historical evidence for the Titanic. Likewise, even if pagan myths existed before the time of Christ, this would not undermine the historical evidence for Jesus’ miraculous life, death, and resurrection. Parallels alone are inconclusive.

Third, the chronology is all wrong. While some of the mystery religions pre-dated Christianity, there is near universal consensus that there are no stories of dying and rising gods until after Christianity. Since the supposed parallels between Christianity and the pagan religions arose only after the origin of the church, the pagan religions could not have influenced Christian beliefs. In fact, these other religions were likely influenced by Christianity rather than the other way around.

The disciples were very clear about their intentions: “What was from the beginning, what we have heard, what we have seen with our eyes, what we have observed and have touched with our hands, concerning the Word of life—that life was revealed, and we have seen it and we testify and declare to you the eternal life that was with the Father and was revealed to us—what we have seen and heard we also declare to you, so that you may have fellowship along with us; and indeed our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ” (1Jn 1:1-3).
